I. READING PASSAGEAnimal Hospital Saves Wild Animals from the City

Just outside the city of Johannesburg, South Africa, a veterinary hospital is saving wild animals that live nearby. "I'd love to be in the bush, but I get more cases here," said Nicci Wright, a veterinary rehabilitation specialist.

Wright and Karin Lourens, a doctor trained to care for animals, set up the hospital two years ago. Since then, they have treated about 4,000 creatures. Both Johannesburg and Pretoria, the South African capital, are expanding. The growth of the two cities is squeezing out animals that are native to the area. The wildlife hospital mainly treats small mammals and large hunting birds that are injured.

The hospital now has about 160 patients. They include leopard tortoises, a python and an otter that was taken far from her natural surroundings when someone tried to keep her as a pet. Many animals coming to the hospital show signs of stress from being hurt by people. Some creatures, like the endangered pangolin, become fearful when they hear a male human voice or smell cigarette smoke.

When the animals are ready to return to the wild, Wright and her team work with nature centers around the country to take the animals to a new, safer home.
